Support for the War Effort

During World War I, people on the home front were encouraged to do all they could to support the troops overseas. Posters, patriotic community groups, and government campaigns suggested that no sacrifice should be spared to ensure victory in Europe. Many people planted “victory gardens” to produce as much food as possible. They reduced the amount of food they ate and tried to waste as little as possible. Meals contained less meat, butter, sugar, and bread so that these foods could be sent overseas. Canada was shipping vast quantities of food to the fighting forces and civilian populations of other Allied countries.

On the wheat fields of the West, thousands of students were often dismissed from school early to help bring in the harvest. Farm women worked long hours in the fields, and women from the cities also lent a hand. They were needed to replace the farm workers who were fighting overseas.

Groups of women of all ages also met regularly to organize community fund raisers and to roll bandages for the troops. Every community held card games, dances, bazaars, and variety shows. The profits from these evenings were used to send soap, writing paper, pencils, and candy to the troops. Some groups also raised money for war victims and war relief.

Not all groups were made up of women of British heritage. Many other ethnic communities including Chinese, Japanese, Jewish, Italian, Aboriginal, and Black women and men also raised funds and contributed what they could. Women of the Six Nations organized a Women’s Patriotic League in 1914. It raised money through garden parties and tag days for Six Nations soldiers overseas. Aboriginal people on the Tyendinaga Reserve near Deseronto, Ontario, allowed some of their land to be used for a flying school during the war. Polish organizations worked with the Red Cross to send money, food, and clothing for war relief in Poland. Chinese women held Rice Bowl festivals and bazaars to raise money for war victims.

The Coloured Women’s Club of Montreal worked with the Red Cross to provide support for the war effort overseas.

Many of these ethnic communities were discriminated against in Canada during this period. They faced racism and intolerance, and did not have the right to vote. However, they were eager to show their loyalty and support the war effort.

Terror on the Home Front

No battles ever took place on Canadian soil during World War I. But from the beginning of the war, there were fears of sabotage and suspicions about spies in Canada. Even before war was declared, Britain warned Canada to take precautions. Militia were posted at major bridges, canals, and railways to guard against sabotage.

Early on the morning of 6 December 1917, however, the horrors of the war did come to the doorstep of Canadians. A terrible explosion rocked the city of Halifax. Halifax was a major shipping port in the war. Most of the North American conveyors with supplies for Europe set out from Halifax.

On that morning in 1917, the Mont Blanc, a French munitions ship carrying a cargo of explosives, collided with the Belgian vessel Iroquois in the harbour. Almost 3000 tonnes of explosives were set off. The blast levelled large sections of Halifax and was heard all over the province. It was even felt in Sydney, over 320 km away. Fires roared through the wooden buildings of the city. A huge tidal wave swamped other ships in the harbour and tossed them in pieces onto the shore. Two thousand people were killed and thousands more were injured or left homeless.

The explosion was one of the worst disasters in Canadian history. It is said that,
New Roles for Women

World War I brought other great changes, especially to the lives of Canadian women. As soon as the war began, hundreds of Canadian women volunteered to work overseas as nurses or ambulance drivers. Many worked in field hospitals just behind the front-line trenches. One operating room nurse wrote in a letter home, "We had 291 operations in ten nights, so that will give you a fair idea of a week's work."

Women also played an important part in the war effort at home. With the general shortage of labour in Canada, the number of women employed in industry rose dramatically. Thirty thousand Canadian women worked in munitions factories and other war industries. These jobs in heavy industry would have been considered unsuitable for women before 1914. Working conditions were difficult and sometimes dangerous. Women also drove buses and streetcars. They worked in banks, on police forces, and in civil service jobs.

I had a very hard job. It had to be that you ran a machine of weights into the shell, and the weight had to be just exact. Quite a few of them didn't have the patience.

It was interesting work but very hard on your nerves. There was a machine that blew up, and I ran to her and we had to go down on our hands and knees and crawl out of the place. So we had a little experience of what it was to be right in a war.

In wartime, there were few men left to work on the farms. Women on the farms brought in the harvests and city women were also recruited to go out and help.

We decided to become homesteaders when we read in the paper that there was a big crop and they needed people to come, and there were no men. So this friend and I said that we would go. We volunteered. Masses of young people went out and brought that all in.

Groups of women of all ages met regularly to knit socks for the soldiers and to roll bandages. They arranged many of the card games, dances, and variety shows that helped fund the parcels sent to the troops.

I wanted to help do my share, and I joined the Red Cross and helped roll... bendages and knit socks. My first ones were big enough to fit an elephant, and after that, I became very proficient—so proficient that I knit a pair of socks a day without any trouble.

You see, everybody felt they had to do something. You just couldn't sit there. There was a phrase, 'Doing your bit.' Well, that was pretty well the keynote feeling all through that First World War. Everybody was extremely patriotic, and everybody wanted to do 'a bit.' If there's anything we could do to help, we must do it.

The Struggle for Women's Rights

Since women were doing so much for the war effort, they wanted a share in making decisions about the country. It was during World War I that an important step forward was taken in Canada for women's rights. At the beginning of the twentieth century, women in many countries had begun to organize themselves to gain the right to vote. Members of this movement in Canada were called suffragists.

Nellie McClung was a suffragist and one of Canada's great social reformers. She wrote, "Certainly women belong in the home, but not 24 hours a day. They should have exactly the same freedom as men." When World War I broke out, it helped to prove that Nellie McClung was right. Women did jobs once performed only by men. The war brought women together in volunteer organizations and employment. They began to share ideas and work for political equality with men. They also took active roles in journalism and campaigned for better public health, working conditions, and wages. They pushed for equal opportunities in careers such as medicine and law, and for the right to own property.

Suffragists campaigned enthusiastically for women's suffrage (the right to vote). Their leaders included Dorothy Davis in British Columbia, Margaret Gordon in Ontario, Emily Murphy and Alice Jamieson in Alberta, and the dynamic Nellie McClung in Manitoba. The first breakthrough for women's suffrage came in Manitoba. In 1916, women were given the right to vote in that province. Within months, Saskatchewan and Alberta also granted women suffrage. Ontario and British Columbia followed suit the next year.

But the main goal was to win the right to vote in federal elections. In the federal election of December 1917, the Wartime Elections Act granted the vote to the mothers, sisters, and wives of soldiers in the armed forces. Canadian nurses serving in the forces could also vote. By the time the war had ended, the right to vote in federal elections had been extended to almost all women in Canada over the age of 21. The Dominion Elections Act (1920) also gave women the right to run for election to Parliament. However, Aboriginal women (and most Aboriginal men), Asians, and many other members of minority groups in Canada were not allowed to vote.

"Never retract, never explain, never apologize—just get the thing done and let them howl," said Nellie McClung. Nellie McClung was president of the Manitoba chapter of the Women's Christian Temperance Union (WCTU). Nellie joined the WCTU, which provided help to people in need, campaigned against the ill effects of alcohol, and supported the rights of women to have a voice in social and political affairs. The WCTU raised petitions, acted as a pressure group on governments, and encouraged debate on key issues to meet its goals.

By 1911, Nellie McClung was increasingly involved in journalism and political activism. She was a founding member of the Political Equality League in Manitoba and spoke out for women's suffrage across the province. Women's pleas for the vote, however, fell on deaf ears in the provincial government. In 1914, Premier Roblin responded to the women's requests with the words, "Now you forget all this nonsense about women voting. Nice women don't want to vote."

Nellie McClung and her supporters decided to fight back by staging a mock parliament in Winnipeg's Walker Theatre. The parliament was run by women and Nellie was premier. Roles were reversed and men were asking for the vote. In a speech, Nellie cleverly turned the tables on the premier's words. "If men are given the vote," she declared, "they will vote too much. Politics unsettles men. Unsettled men mean unsettled bills—broken furniture, broken vows, and divorce... Men cannot be trusted with the ballot. Men's place is on the farm.

The performance was a roaring success. When World War I broke out some months later, women proved that they could perform the same jobs as men. They provided massive support on the home front for the soldiers overseas. Governments had to admit that the war could not have been won without the support of women. In 1916, women made their breakthrough in Canada. They first gained the right to vote in the province of Manitoba. By 1918, they had gained the right to vote in federal elections.

1. Nellie McClung wrote: "War is not inevitable... War is a crime committed by men, and therefore when enough people say it shall not be, it cannot be. This will not happen until women are allowed to say what they think of war." Do you agree? Why or why not?

2. Governments did not grant Asian and Aboriginal women, women of colour, and women of other minority groups the vote during the war, even though they also worked for the war effort and campaigned for their rights through their own organizations. Why do you think this was so?
